Is the US moving to deport a group of men to South Sudan?

On May 20, news emerged that the U.S. was moving to deport a group of men, apparently to South Sudan. A Homeland Security filing in federal court in Massachusetts states that the deportees who were on the plane include two citizens of Cuba and two from Burma, along with natives of Laos, Mexico and Vietnam.

Why is South Sudan sending a prisoner to a third country?

In many cases, they served lengthy criminal sentences. Seven of the men have no ties to South Sudan, but the administration wants to send them there as part of an effort to expel people to so-called third countries when U.S. law bars them from being sent to their home countries or when their home countries will not accept them.

Will trump's Djibouti base stay in a converted conference room?

The Trump administration said the converted conference room in the shipping container is the only viable place to house the men on the base in Djibouti, where outdoor daily temperatures rise above 100 degrees Fahrenheit (38 degrees Celsius), according to the declaration from an ICE official.

Where are Djibouti detainees now?

Harper explained in a sworn declaration filed Thursday that the detainees are being held in a shipping container repurposed as a conference room inside Camp Lemonnier, a U.S. naval base in the East African nation of Djibouti.

Why did DHS release migrants from South Sudan?

On May 21, federal judge Brian Murphy ordered that the migrants stay in DHS custody, instead of being released in South Sudan, in order for the department to give them more time to contest their deportation to the African country.

Did a lower-court Judge Block A US military base in Djibouti?

The eight men have been stuck in limbo on a U.S. military base in Djibouti after a lower-court judge blocked their deportation. The Trump administration accused a lower-court judge who blocked the deportations of defying the Supreme Court. | Suzanne Plunkett-Pool/Getty Images
